

Brian's Position on TERM LIMITS - Re-election is up to your constituents

Our small county is quite different due to its size and close-knit communities compared to elections at the state and federal levels. Elected leaders are better known to voters, and voters are much more easily in touch with their elected office holders at the county level. I believe residents recognize the importance of good leadership.

The relationships I've built, my experience gained over the years in serving you, and the reputation I've built are essential. Without these qualities, I would not have been re-elected for successive terms. Without these qualities, individuals will be voted in and out of office so fast your head will spin.

There is without a doubt a huge learning curve and having someone with knowledge of how the systems work is paramount. Someone with a lot of experience and knowledge on the issues – affecting the whole county – not just Plymouth.

Frankly, I hadn't heard much about term limits until my opponent ran against me last time. Now again, we are hearing it along with "change".

The voters have kept me in office. They know the job I do. They trust me.

Term limits are determined by voters. If your constituents trust you, they will re-elect you. Plain and simple.

So, where do I stand on term limits at the local level? I believe residents get to decide that. It is a better process for our communities.
